Pain in Multiple Sclerosis

Pain can be a symptom of Multiple Sclerosis (MS). In MS the nerves may be temporarily or permanently affected by damage to the layer of insulation around them (demyelination). When this occurs in pain nerves it can result in pain. This pain is often burning or aching in nature and can sometimes be treated with drugs.

If you have a pain problem, which needs treatment you should contact your own doctor who can refer you to a pain clinic in your area. This sheet is for information only and cannot be treated as a substitute for the medical advice of your own doctor. The Pain Relief Foundation is not able to offer individual medical advice.
